LOWER MANHATTAN Gearing up for visits by John McCain and Barack Obama, ground zero cleanup workers, first responders, volunteers and Lower Manhattan workers and residents demanded yesterday that the presidential candidates make 9/11-health a national priority.

Members from the Beyond Ground Zero Network, which helped fight for a community 9/11 treatment program at Bellevue Hospital, said they are still waiting for federal help for the treatment and monitoring of residents, students and workers exposed to the toxic dust from the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Besides respiratory problems, many are now being diagnosed with lung disease, neurological disorders, gynecological problems and cancers, they claim.

"We can't wait for the studies to tell us we're sick," spokesman Josh Anderson said. "We need treatment now."
